

OPENING READING

YOU WHO WANDER

Come back to me, my child! You who wander — come, before fall of the night of life, when all enwrapped with dense shadows, you cannot see the way.

As deep has called to deep across the centuries of time, so have I called to you, and in your egotistic blindness every path save one — the right one — pulls you farther from me, and I am compelled to stand still and see you go to certain sorrow.

The star which entices you is not the home you seek, nor can you reach the nearer star where I now stand, unless you now will take my hand and let me lead you home.

I do not threaten you, child of mine, but with my soul in arms against your foes, I plead with you to turn your back on all the voices of the night, and even though it be on sharpened rocks which pierce your feet, retrace your steps...and come back to Me.
